Senator Barbour's Reply. WASHINGTON, D. C., May 10, 1892.

To the Editor of the Richmond Dispatch : Although temporarily absent at the time. I have since read with regret the mond to-morrow week, will forget the proceedings of the Cleveland Club of Richmond on the evening of Thursday last, at which one of the orators of the occasion, a Mr. Williams, a member of Congress from the State of Massachusetts, went out of his way to impugn the motives of the Senators of Virginia, and to charge that their opposition to the nomination of Mr. Cleveland for the presidency grew out of their failure to his administration, and this ungentle-

I was not so much surprised that the germ of this mean insinuation should have emanated from such a source, but found approval and congenial soil in any meeting of Virginia democrats, and especially in a meeting held at the Capital of the State.

I am quite willing to admit that publie men are properly subject to fair criticism in regard to their course on public measures, but I do not concede the right of any man, whether he comes from Massachusetts or from Richmond, in the absence of all evidence on the subject, to assail my personal motives or to charge that my course in respect to this matter has been controlled by improper personal considerations.

For myself I pronounce the allegation that I was opposed to the nomination of Mr. Cleveland on personal grounds not only as absolutely false, but without even the color of truth. had some inkling before that I was charged with being opposed to Mr. Cleveland on personal grounds, but this is the first occasion where the charge has been directly made in public, and I take the opportunity now to nail it to the counter as a lie. My personal relations with President Cleveland were always courteous and respectful, if not cordial. I never complained of any action on his part in declining to give appointments to my personal and po-litical friends, and do not now remember that I had any justification to do so. I presume that on my recommendation as much patronage was distributed as on that of the average member of Congress during Mr. Cleveland's administration, but I did not enter the Senate until March, 1889, when his term as President had expired.

It is true that I differed with the polof the then administration in retaining republicans in office and appointing negroes from a distance to public positions in the District of Columbia, but so far as any personal feeling against Mr.Cleveland, connected with or growing out of the distribution of offices is concerned, I disclaim it, My object tion to the present nomination of Mr. Cleveland as a candidate for the presidency rests, I trust, upon higher grounds than mere personal considerations on my part.

The success of the democratic party at the ensuing election is far more important to the country, and particularly to the southern States, than the personal fortunes of any individual. Mr. Cleveland has enjoyed the highest honors of thing to his reputation or to the esteem in which he is held by his countrymen. After looking over the whole ground with care I do not believe that Mr. Cleveland can be elected if nominated, and in this opinion it is within bounds to affirm that nine-tenths of the democratic members of Congress, in my de-liberate judgment, concur. The general impression of senators representing democratic States likely to cast their electoral votes for a democrat in a presidential election, and of whom I can speak from better knowledge and association, with very few exceptions, is to

Under such circumstances, to nomi-Mr. Cleveland, with the demoagainst him and the people of New York divided into hostile factions, in my judgment would be a grievous and fatal mistake. His views against the free coinage of silver seem to be in conflict with public sentiment in the agricultural States, and from some cause the labor vote of the country does not appear to be friendly or inclined to his election. It is exceedingly doubtful whether the democratic party can elect any such candidate who may be nominated at its national convention for the presidency. It is apparent that success can only be obtained by the democratic party with the exercise of discretion and harmony in its lines. I regard it as very unfortunate for the democratic party in Virginia that these personal issues should have been raised inside the organization and that these mugwump orators from Massachusetts and New York should have ment of Archbishop Ireland's plan in been brought to Richmond to tell our regard to parachial schools people how to vote and what to do in a presidential nomination. I should think that the member from Massachusetts had his hands full in looking after his that cholera is epidemic in that city. own State, which in a presidential year never fails to vote the republican tick-et.
